Skins show trailer

I've emphasized in recent months that when an economic growth cycle matures, second-tier opportunities in many industries often become very profitable, recalls Jim Powell, editor of Global Changes & Opportunities Report.Currently, appearing several new opportunities in real estate as millions of Millennials become successful enough to finally buy their own homes. Because most Millennials aren't as affluent as their Generation Z parents, or their Baby Boomer grandparents, they're more likely to buy affordable manufactured homes in parks than they are to buy site-built homes in more upscale areas. More from Jim Powell: Five Favorites for Energy InvestorsAs a result, trailer parks — as they're still often called — are no longer considered to be the black sheep of the housing industry. Instead, they become cash cows. Today's newer manufactured home parks are particularly popular because they usually offer attractive amenities. Security is at the top of the list. Most upscale parks are actually fenced communities for people who can't afford to live in one for site-built homes in more expensive areas. Many trailer parks also have swimming pools, tennis courts, dog exercise areas, meeting halls for parties, and so on. A growing number of parks are also limited to older residents who would rather not be in a family park with children and parents coming and going all the time. A few parks go in the other direction: they cater to young families. I visited a family park on a weekend a year ago, and it was pure pandemonium. I couldn't get out fast enough. Of course, the kids loved it. Several major equity firms — including the Blackstone Group — have discovered the profit potential of upscale trailer parks. We beat them all to the party when we bought Sun Communities (SUJ) in March 2014 when it was $44.31. The stock is a top performer and is now up 185.0% to $126.27. Sun navigates the current housing trend and looks likely to keep going. It's not too late for long-term investors to buy the stock. See also: Telecom Talk: Dish to SprintWise, Cavco Industries (CVCO) - which we bought in January - remains attractive and just made a big price jump. The company makes many of the innovative manufactured homes that appeal to Millennials. Cavco is still OK to buy, but I'll wait for the recent price hic to come down. I can now also recommend Equity Lifestyle Properties (ELS) which benefits from the increasing popularity of modern trailer parks. ELS owns or manages 412 properties in 33 states and British Columbia. In total, the company has 155,133 individual sites. Equity Lifestyle is the leading operator of manufactured home communities. RV resorts and campgrounds in North America. The company has somewhat more upscale properties than Sun Communities and should be a good companion stock to own. Equity Lifestyle also focus on popular retirement locations and holiday destinations along canals, lakes and golf in addition, the company offers many rental units, a business that avoids most parks. Equity lifestyle properties prosper. For the most recent quarter, net income increased from $53.1 million, or $0.58 per share, to $113.3 million, or $1.26 per share. I think ELS will be a lucrative long-term investment. More aggressive investors who want a smaller company that runs manufactured home communities should consider UMH Properties (UMH). The company has 21,000 developed home sites, mainly in the Northeast and Midwest. The company also has an attractive portfolio of REIT securities. What I find most attractive about UMH is that it has a lot of institutional support. In fact, institutions own 62% of the company. UMH is also doing well; after eight consecutive years of double-digit growth, first-quarter rents and related revenue rose 12% compared to the same period in 2018.The company carries a lot of debt, but that's almost always the case for REITs who buy and develop properties to expand their business. More from MoneyShow.com:(Bloomberg) - A steep sale in Bitcoin fuels concerns that the cryptocurrency bubble is about to burst. Bitcoin slipped as much as 21% over Sunday and Monday in the biggest two-day slide since March. While the digital token recovered some of the losses during the European session, it was still down for the day. It needs to be determined whether this is the start of a bigger correction, but we've now seen this parabola break so it might just be, said Vijay Ayyar, head of business development with crypto exchange Luno in Singapore.Bitcoin, has seen more than quads in recent years, evoking memories of the 2017 mania first making cryptocurrencies Prices nearly reached $42,000 on Jan. 8 with retail traders and Wall Street investors claiming for a piece of the action. Bitcoin slid 6.2% to $35,555.59 as of 10:37 a.m. in London. Time to take money off the table, Scott Minerd, chief investment officer at Guggenheim Investments, said in a tweet from his verified Twitter account. Bitcoin's parabolic rise is unsustainable in the near term. In late December, Minerd predicted Bitcoin could eventually reach $400,000.True Believers in Bitcoin agree the rally this time around is different from previous boom-bust cycles because the asset has matured with the entry of institutional investors and is increasingly seen as a legitimate hedge against dollar weakness and inflation risk. Others worry that the rally is unbridled from reason and fueled by large swaths of fiscal and monetary stimulus, with Bitcoin unlikely to ever serve as a viable currency alternative. With so many investors wanting to get rich on Bitcoin, the asset is attracting the attention of regulators. On Monday, the UK's financial watchdog issued a stark warning for consumers who want to benefit out of crypto: be ready to lose everything. Invest in cryptoassets, or investments and connecting with them usually involves taking very high risks with investors' money, the Financial Conduct Authority said in a statement. The FCA's concerns include price discontinuing, the complexity of products on offer and the lack of consumer protection regulation around many of the products. Premium segment-focused Nio Inc (NYSE: NIO) could be geared up to make mass-market vehicles, company CEO William Li suggested Sunday, as reported by Reuters.What Happened: The Chinese automaker, which competes with the likes of Audi maker Volkswagen AG (OTC: VWAGY), Mercedes-Benz parent Daimler AG (OTC: DDAIF), and Bayerische Motoren Works AG (OTC: BMWYY), would launch mass-market vehicles under a different marque, such as , is it possible that we can enter the massive market, but certainly not with Nio brand, the CEO said. Why it matters: Nio launched his first sedan called the ET7 over the weekend. The vehicle's standard expense is priced at $69,185 before subsidies. The sedan will pitch Nio against high-end competitors, but not against market leader Tesla Inc (NASDAQ:TSLA). The car could also offer competition to an EV made by Apple Inc (NASDAQ:AAPL) that is likely to partner with Korea's Hyundai Motor Company (OTC: HYMTF) as early as March, according to an unconfirmed report. Price action: Nio shares closed nearly 8.5 percent higher at $58.92 on Friday, gaining 0.24% in the after-hours session. Suriname basinInvestors have a clear task ahead: find the stocks that will rise with an approaching bull market. Previous performance, of course, is no guarantee of future gains, but the stocks that have achieved rapid growth in recent months are a logical place to start looking for tomorrow's winners. There are, of course, worries centered on the newly Democratic-controlled U.S. Senate that will give the incoming Biden administration a chance to implement its tax-raising plan and the weak December jobs numbers; will they combine to derail the market's strong upward trend? Not so fast, according to Credit Suisse's Jonathan Golub. The firm's chief U.S. equity strategist raised its 2021 year-end outlook, showing it off from 4,050 to 4,200.Golub, firstly that the Democratic candidates won both of Georgia's Senate seats in the recent runoff vote, a development that gives the Dems effective control — albeit at the closest of possible margins — The incoming Biden administration has promised itself to report both a summarized COVID relief package and reverse President Trump's policies. Control of Congress is a necessary condition. Golub said, this should lead to additional stimulus, including extending payments to individuals. The second point that noting as a major supporting event for the markets is the COVID vaccination programme. While describing the slow progression of the programme as underwhelming, he adds that he is the population of individuals will grow, economic activity will expand. The main economic effect of the impeachment policy, in Golub's view, is a likely coincidence of revamped consumer demand [that] cannot be ignored. By describing that question, Golub says, We're going to have the biggest stimulating event in the history of the planet in the second half of this year... The strategist now sees — before the second half takeoff — as to be to buy in. And that brings us back to growth supplies. We used the TipRanks database to pinpoint three exciting growth names, according to the analyst community. Each analyst-backed ticker stands to carve more gains on top of its already impressive growth. Innovative Industrial Properties (IIPR)The growing normalization of the cannabis industry in the U.S. has opened up a variety of opportunities for forward-looking businesses. Innovative Industrial Properties are among these. This company is a real estate investment trust with a twist — it focuses on properties in the medical use cannabis sector. Like most REITs, IIPR acquires, owns, manages, and rental properties — but its target customer base is composed of experiences, state-licensed, medical marijuana operators. The company's portfolio consists of industrial greenhouses, leased as growing facilities for medical marijuana suppliers. The value of this niche is evident from the inventory performance. IIPR shares are up 137% over the past 52 weeks. Financial performance matched the stock performance; revenues have been gaining consistently, quarter over quarter, for the past two years, and in 3Q20, the last reported, hit $34.33 million. That was a 197% year-over-year gain. There was a slight earnings dip in Q1 and Q2 of 2020, during the height of the corona panic, but the company's Q3 EPS reversed that, and the 86-cent squeeze was 59% yoy. Piper Sandler analyst Daniel Santos sees momentum building in the marijuana industry, especially now that the Senate has shifted to Democratic control. COVID has created its own tailwind as states rush to fill budget holes with alternative tax sources. While this could lead to more liberal license grants, management was confident that most states would opt for a limited licensing program and would benefit existing operators - a major boost to IIPR... Strong operator fundamentals and demand from institutional investors could lead to an increased pace in acquisitions, Santos noted. Santos rates IIPR an overweight (that is, Buy), and its $250 price target implies an upside of 40% for the next 12 months. (To watch Santos' record, click here) Overall, IIPR has 7 recent reviews on record, breaking down to 5 Buys and 2 Holds, giving the stock a Moderate Buy analyst consensus rating. Shares recently appreciated quickly, and are now trading at $178.44. (See IIPR stock analysis on TipRanks) Par Technology Corporation (PAR)Par Technology provides support in the that enables software, hardware, support services and other research, PAR's applications applications Software, content management, business intelligence, food safety monitoring, sales terminals and video monitors. PAR's restaurant segment boasts operations in 110 countries, with more than 100,000 user installations. The company also includes a government services segment, with providing computer-based engineering services and system design to the Federal government. PAR is an important contractor of such services at the Department of Defense. This company's growth has been impressive over the past year. The 52-week profit is 103%, reflecting the necessity of strong online support for PAR's target customer base as it works to recover from the COVID-downturn. Third-quarter 2020 revenue recovered from a modest dip in the first half of the year, and at $54.8 million hit a two-year high. Among the fans is BTIG analyst Mark Palmer, who wrote, While we expect PAR's restaurant and retail revenue to grow by about 20% in each of the next three years, we expect his Brink software business to put annual growth in the 40% context during that span... As PAR executes over its transition to a cloud software/SaaS mode, the valuation must grow to better reflect the recurring nature of its subscription-based revenue and the margins associated with its software offerings. In line with his comments, the 5-star analyst rates PAR a Buy along with an $80 price target. This figure indicates his confidence in a 29% one year upside to the stock. (To watch Palmer's record, click here) PAR has strong backing from the rest of the Street. With a single Hold, all 4 other analysts recommend a review over the past 3 months, PAR stock recommends as a Buy. (See PAR stock analysis on TipRanks) Maxlinear, Inc. (MXL)The semiconductor sector is an important industry, and Maxlinear produces chips for a variety of roles: wireless and data center infrastructure, industrial connectivity and IoT programs, cable broadband and WiFi 6 network. Maxlinear's products are found in digital resumes, mobile devices, computers and notebooks. Semiconductors have been on a tear in recent months, and MXL stock is no exception. The shares are up 81% since this time last January, and that timeframe includes sharp losses last February and March. The shift to remote work and virtual schools has put a premium on fast and reliable connections, which in turn have increased demand for the underlying chipsets. In 3Q20, Maxlinear's top line jumped to $156 million, a 140% consecutive gain and a 95% year-over-year gain. The company credits stronger demand for broadband and connectivity products starting 2Q20 as the driver of the profits. Suji DeSilva, 5-star analyst with Roth Capital, is flat-out bullish on this stock, and his comments make it clear. We believe MXL represents a serviced in broadband and network RF and mixed-signal opportunities. We believe MXL sees continued strongly connected home demand boosted by continued remote work/learning. We expect MXL's to take advantage of procurement accredia in CY21. DeSilva said. DeSilva places a $50 price target and a Buy rating on MXL shares. Its target marks a one-year upside of 34%. (To watch DeSilva's record, click here) All in the whole, the word on the Street rings largely bullish on this chip maker, with TipRanks analytics demonstrating MXL as a moderate buy. The stock has 7 reviews on record, with a 5 to 2 split between Buys and Holds. (Bloomberg Opinion) - U.S. government bond yields have registered some notable moves in the first few days of 2021. Should they continue at their current rate, the risk causing headaches for both policymakers and stock investors because of their underlying executives. In less than two weeks, the experience a significant increase in yields in longer-dated bonds, or what is known in financial markets as a bear anchorage. The yields on 10- and 30-year bonds rose 20 basis points and 22 basis points, respectively. The between those maturities and the biennial Treasury bill, on which the Federal Reserve's policies have a significant influence, widened significantly — from 80 basis points to 98 basis points for the 10-year and from 152 basis points to 174 basis points for the 30-year. These moves come when Fed policy has constantly sought to significantly suppress returns and keep them in a tight trading bond. Should the moves continue, they would also challenge some of the strong managers of funds in stocks and other risk assets by reducing their relative attractiveness and by weakening the buy signals issued by models incorporating the discounts of future cash flows. Moreover, their persistence will be concerning for the economic outlook due to their underlying managers and the potential impact on sectors that are sensitive to interest rates such as housing. What are those drivers? The recent moves in the U.S. yield curve reflect no change, real or forward-looking, in the Fed's extremely accommodative monetary policy standoff. Indeed, the minutes of December's Federal Open Market Committee meeting, released last week, reiterated that the central bank has no intention of getting its stimulus anytime soon, and when it does, the process will be extremely gradual. Some of the other potential contributors to higher returns, such as increased government default risk or more favorable growth prospects, are also unlikely to be in play. If anything, the Fed's willingness to expand its balance sheet without limitation reinforces the idea that there is a steady and reliable non-commercial buyer of government bonds. Meanwhile, growth prospects have deteriorated in the shadow of the recent increase in infections, hospitalisation and deaths related to Covid-19. The monthly U.S. jobs report on Friday already reported a loss of 140,000 jobs in December. The Democratic sweep of the two Georgia Senate runoff elections last week raised the prospect of higher government budget deficits and much more debt financing. But with the Fed not only committed to maintaining its large-scale asset purchases, but also open to increasing it and moving more of the purchases to longer-dated securities, so a prospect shouldn't have an immediate significant impact on returns. The most likely drivers are then expectations for higher inflation and more hesitation on the part of Treasury buyers. The former is supported by moves in inflation break-even and other inflation-sensitive market segments. The latter is consistent with the substantial market chat on how government bonds, which are so highly suppressed by the Fed and face an asymmetric outlook for yield cutouts, are no longer ideal for mitigate risk. An intensification of the recent moves in yield curves in the weeks ahead will be alarming for both policymakers and risk takers in markets. While the Fed is hoping for higher inflation, it doesn't want it to materialize through stagflation — that is, even more disappointing and higher inflation. The Fed has few tools, if any, to lead the economy out of such an operating environment. This, as well as the hit on corporate earnings from the lack of economic growth, will worsen what is already an extremely large disconnect between financial valuations and fundamentals. The most dominant market view right now, and it's quasi universal, is that stocks and other risk assets will continue to rise because of the abundant liquidity injections coming from central banks and allocating more private funds. After all, central banks show no tendency to moderate their huge stimulus. And investors remain strongly conditioned by a powerful mix that has served them very well so far: TINA (there's no alternative to stocks) fuels BTD (buying the dip) behavior in response to even the smallest market sellout, especially given FOMO (the fear of missing out on repeating impressive market rallies). As valid as these considerations are at this moment of time, they also warrant a close monitoring of the yield curve for U.S. government bonds. A significant continuation of recent trends will challenge the Fed, investors and the economy. This column does not necessarily reflect the opinion of the editorial or Bloomberg's writers. Mohamed A.
